The dissertation will provide you with an opportunity to undertake a research project on a topic within development studies in consultation with your supervisor. It is intended to complement the more conventional methods of coursework and examination assessment, allowing you to investigate and consider themes and issues of importance to you in more depth. The dissertation is not an extended essay; rather it is a (social) scientific piece of research that sets out a clear question and methods, and develops a coherent argument based on a review of existing and/or interpretation of fresh evidence, and application to theory. Please note, the dissertation is restricted to International Development and Environmental Geography & International Development students.

The aim is to offer students an advanced anthropology module which builds on students' engagement with development issues, to consider some of the enduring puzzles of social change, to deliver in-depth understanding of particular themes, and to support students in intensive small group development of their anthropological skills, in order to understand social change and contribute to development theory and practice. We use teaching methods based on small group work of seminars and tutorials, in order to develop skills for independent scholarship, appropriate for 3rd year DEV students.
