

Dr Harry Dyer

Harry is a digital sociologist and lecturer in Education at the University of East Anglia. His research broadly explores the impact of social media on culture, public knowledge, and education. This has included research exploring the ways technology is changing student transitions to higher education, research into 'flat earth' communities and what they mean for public knowledge and attitudes towards science, and research into the rise of 'fake news'. Most recently, his work has been published as a monograph with Springer Nature (2020) title 'Designing the Social' in which he proposes a new theoretical framework to consider the relationship between social media and identity. He serves as editor of Digital Culture and Education, is a trustee for Truth and Trust Online, and is a co-convener of the British Sociological Association's Digital Sociology Group.